

The Airline Oracle

August 16, 2024

Henry Harteveldt (BSM '81) takes leisure very seriously.

In a career spanning 40 years, Harteveldt, founder and president of San Francisco-based Atmosphere Research Group, has established himself as one of the travel industry's leading experts, delivering market insights to clients around the world and providing analysis of industry news and trends to print and broadcast media.

During that time, Harteveldt has logged more than six million air miles, launched countless ad campaigns, shaped corporate identities and helped design passenger cabins, airport lounges and hotel rooms. He has worked for four airlines, including one he helped launch.

"I never set out to become an industry analyst, and I never set out to become a market researcher," Harteveldt says. "But I'm by nature very curious, and this is something that Tulane encouraged.

“It certainly has been a very interesting career.”

Interested in aviation since childhood, Harteveltdt learned to fly a plane before he could drive a car. His interest in travel analysis really took flight at the Freeman School, where, as an undergraduate marketing major he got his first experience as an airline industry analyst. For a marketing class project, he and several classmates surveyed travelers at New Orleans International Airport, uncovering a preference for low prices, nonstop flights, and convenient connections. The students presented their findings to a panel of airline professionals, including Braniff International’s vice president of marketing, but the executive dismissed their recommendations. Years later, after Braniff shut down, Harteveltdt ran into the executive, who remembered him and belatedly acknowledged the validity of the students’ insights.

After graduating from Tulane, Harteveltdt began his career at a Dallas advertising agency, where one of his clients was American Airlines. Two years later, he joined TWA as global marketing manager and spent the next 16 years in senior marketing roles with airlines, hotels and marketing firms. In 2000, Harteveltdt became head of global travel industry research with Forrester Research just as the Internet was ushering in a new era of travel.

“I’m lucky to have been at the forefront of how the travel industry has evolved into a digital business,” Harteveltdt says. “It’s a very, very different industry than the one that I first entered four decades ago. Gone are the days of steak dinners in coach and leg room and amenities like that. But at the same time, we now have Wi-Fi on almost every airplane.”

In that time, Harteveltdt has also become a frequent commentator on travel-related issues for major media outlets, including The New York Times, The Wall Street Journal and The Times of London, and he appears regularly on CBS, CNBC, Bloomberg and CNN.

“A benefit of having worked in the industry and having been an industry analyst for nearly 25 years is that you understand how it works,” he explains. “In December of 2022, when terrible weather was sweeping across the U.S. and Southwest Airlines was experiencing a massive operational disruption, I put a night in Paris on hold because I had a professional obligation to speak with these reporters and provide my perspective on what was going on.”

Henry Harteveldt on the three biggest current trends in travel

Proxy travel: “More than half of travelers in the U.S. say that they will change destinations if their primary destination--the one they’re most interested in visiting--is too expensive, whether that’s a function of airfare, lodging or anything else. So we are extremely willing to look for acceptable compromises on where we go or when we travel in order to meet our budget. And that’s up from a range of 30-to-40% since before COVID.”

Increased spontaneity: “We are more spontaneous in our traveling interests, with more than one in five travelers saying that they’re willing to travel at a moment’s notice if they find the right airfare or hotel rate.”

Costly tourism: “Travel is increasingly something that only the middle- or upper-middle class can afford. Airfares have crept up, and lodging costs, rental cars, dining out and entertainment have increased. While the industry has tried to make itself more financially accessible and worked to become more democratic in terms of giving people the opportunity to travel, fewer people are currently able to afford travel versus those who would like to travel.”

In his career, Harteveldt has seen both highs and lows. He was there for TWA’s memorable “Leading the Way. TWA” ad campaign, he was there in 1985 when terrorists hijacked TWA Flight 847, and he was there in 1986 when flight attendants went on strike. He served as an industry analyst during 9/11, the Great Recession, and the wave of mergers that left the industry with four dominant carriers: Delta, American, United and Southwest.

Without a doubt, however, the biggest disruption Harteveldt says he witnessed was the pandemic.

“COVID shut down travel around the world,” he says.

In the midst of the pandemic, Harteveldt didn’t pinpoint exactly when he expected worldwide travel to resume, but he advised airlines to be prepared for a strong comeback. True to his predictions, travel rebounded fiercely in an explosion of what he describes as “revenge travel.”

“It was like this on-off switch,” he says. “One day you’re not traveling, and the next day, everybody and their brother was traveling.”

One outcome of COVID-19 has been the rise of blended business-leisure travel. While not a new concept, Harteveldt says the widespread adoption of remote work has made this hybrid tourism more prevalent, accounting for at least 20% of current travel.

Today, looking back on his career, Harteveldt credits the well-rounded education he received at Tulane for his longevity and success. He cherishes the time he spent at Tulane, where he received a foundation in both liberal arts and business, and he’s excited that the Freeman School now offers an undergraduate certificate program in hospitality, providing a clear pathway for students who might want to follow in his footsteps.

“Some people dismiss travel and tourism as frivolous, yet it is an $11 trillion industry and accounts for roughly one out of every eight jobs worldwide,” Harteveldt says. “In some countries, it is, if not the largest, then the second largest source of GDP. So travel is big business. Travel is complex. It can be amazingly rewarding and fulfilling. It is, in a way, a noble calling to work in travel, especially in the airline industry. And it can be a lot of fun.”

--Mary Sparacello

Interested in advancing your education and/or career? Learn more about Freeman’s wide range of graduate and undergraduate programs. Find the right program for you.